

Emma couldn't help but count everything in sight regardless of the situation. One. Her mind raced back to the day she rescued him. His clothing was rustic, his hair was too long, and his face belonged in a romantic comedy. Two. But he did have that tattoo of a flaming cross down the side of his neck, in retrospect that was clearly a red flag. She found herself no longer wondering who he was, but rather, what he was. Three. Three didn't seem so bad. As she sped toward the dock (with every intention of slamming into it), she turned around and looked at his absent face smiling nervously back at her, bracing himself as three black winged Angels chased their runaway boat. She now knew he wasn't human. What she didn't know was that she had unwittingly put herself in the middle of a reigniting celestial war because she had mistakenly saved a guy sought after by both factions. She also doesn't know that his real name is Michael, and that he was the Michael that all other Michaels were named after. She probably wouldn't want to know that he has a brother named Luc, short for Lucifer. Eighteen was going to be a tough year, and she had never even driven a boat before. Fallen follows the journey of a misguided angel, forced to discover the meaning of being human, with the help of his obsessive-compulsive guardian teenager. It is the first in a trilogy to be followed by Retribution, and finally, Redemption.
